

Paris Journal 2010

Tuesday, February 2

We went to see Avatar today. It's a good way to spend a rainy day. I had to laugh occasionally at the movie conventions that were in it. I don't really think it was meant to be funny. I think it is this generation's Star Wars. It's an action flick with lots of female heroes.

I took a picture of the movie theater when we walked into it. It's nice. 10 minutes by bus on the corner of Montparnasse near the train station. There are about 4 movie houses on that street and corner.

Here are a few photos of our walk home that day.

There is an unusually shaped building on Port Royal as we head for home. It is a center for adolescents. It seems to be a hospital where they treat depression and drug addiction and other maladies. The interior is really bright and beautiful. The building is completely of glass and is sort of triangular in shape. We walked in the other day and looked around reading the signs to try to figure out what it was.

Then I took a picture of the old military hospital that is behind our building. The previous photo I posted was of the new building. The dome of the Val de Grace church rises above the building in the background.

Here is a photo of the sidewalk where the open air market on Port Royal happens in the mornings.

